Research

I am primarily interested in studying the effects of accounting and financial information on stock prices and other financial securities. Using accounting data, I endeavor to study the extent to which the stock market is or is not efficient. Some of my articles suggest that careful analysis of financial data can lead to superior or abnormal returns. To better understand my research findings and my research ideas, I frequently invest in the stock market and consult on investing ideas. I have also published research on futures market and research methodologies.

Teaching

My teaching goes hand in hand with my research interests, my personal investing and consulting. I have taught basic and intermediate financial accounting, cost accounting, corporate finance, international finance, investments, and financial statement analysis at the undergraduate, the MBA, and the PhD level at the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania, Tulane University, University of Florida, University of Rochester, ITESM (Mexico) and CEIBS (China). In one of the courses that I developed, the students managed $2 million under my supervision. I have received several recognitions for teaching when I was at Tulane.

Recent Teaching Award: October 2009: MBA Professor of the Module, Fall 2009
